Letters: Opinions from your neighbors

While the city complied with all notice and production requirements, the massive advertising campaign for the Chamber's event overshadowed the city's official notices of both the council meeting presentation and the Thursday lunch event, which left the impression that one needed to pay to hear the mayor speak.

I think the State of the City address is a big deal and residents should have the opportunity to attend an in-person presentation. This means that weekday lunch and evening meetings pose a time barrier to many residents. Perhaps a family-friendly Saturday presentation would give more residents the opportunity to attend and share in the celebration.

The venue is another important factor when planning such an event. For those that rely on public transportation or cannot afford the $5.75 per gallon gas prices, a location that is close to where residents, who rely on alternate transportation live would encourage attendance.

Finally, and equally important would be to get the word out through a variety of media sources so that all residents are aware of the opportunity to hear the accomplishments achieved and the challenges the city will face in the future.

In going one step further, a combined State of the City and a State of the District event would provide both legislative bodies the opportunity to inform residents of what is happening in the community and in our schools in a more convenient two-for-one event.

Perhaps Mayor Marilyn Ezzy Ashcraft and Alameda Unified School District Board President Jennifer Williams could discuss the possibility to further promote the notion of open and accessible government for all residents.

— Jeff Cambra, Commissioner of City of Alameda Open Government Commission

Housing: State law over local laws

resources, including authority to file lawsuits against any city that ignores State law. If Alameda is in violation of State housing law, the city may be fined between $10,000 and $600,000 per month, until the City Council adopts a compliant Housing Element.

If Alameda is in violation of State housing law, Alameda should be prepared to lose its ability to regulate land use or issue building permits (which is a power that is granted to the City by the State). Under State law, the State will decide what to approve and any housing project with 20% of the units for lower income households will be approved even if the project does not comply with Alameda height, zoning, or general plan standards.

California's housing crisis has reached historic proportions. Alameda's appointed and elected decision makers must comply with State law by adopting a compliant Housing Element, which will certainly include rezoning certain sites and districts to allow more housing to be built. This process is underway now, and all Alamedans are encouraged and invited to help. You can help by reviewing the draft Housing Element, preparing your own list of new housing sites if you don't agree with the sites included in the draft Element, and submitting your comments to the city. All the materials are available to you at www.alameda2040.org. It will take all of us and all of you to do it in the best way possible.
